

The Adventures of Ann

By HAL COFFMAN

(Copyright, 1938, International Feature Service, Inc.)

Harwood picked up the jeweled dagger Betty had dropped and looked at it reminiscently.

CHAPTER 33.

As the mysterious woman finished her story and stopped sobbing, both Ann and Betty ran to her side and tried to comfort her. "Come with me," said Betty as she tried to lead her away. "The other guests separated, some going up on deck while others went to their staterooms. One of the men tried to laugh it off to the others as they went up the companionway. "Rather a nasty mess Harwood's got into. It's never pleasant when they turn on you," he chuckled to himself.

The captain himself had come hurriedly on hearing Harwood's ring. This same captain had sailed Harwood's yacht in all parts of the world, and scenes like these were no novelty to him. Harwood poured himself a large glass of wine and, turning to the captain, told him, "We head for home at once. Hurry, please."

Betty and Ann finally got the mysterious woman to their stateroom, leaving Harwood sitting at the empty table in the big salon alone. His foot touched something under the table, and he reached and picked it up. It was the jeweled dagger the woman had passed to Betty. As he sat back in his chair he stared at it, remembering he had given it to her years before when they were traveling in India.

"It's a lucky thing for me," he mused, "that she didn't start swinging this tonight." He tossed it on the table and covered it with a napkin. He got up, yawning, and said to himself, "Oh, well, we won't get in till tomorrow. Many things can happen before then."
